

R.I.S.E

Audio Series

FIVE GUIDED SELF-LEADERSHIP
RESETS FOR AMBITIOUS MOTHERS

*Because you don't need more time.
You need a better way to lead your life.*

PRACTICAL TOOLS • DEEPER CLARITY • REAL CHANGE

WELCOME

Why I Created This

I spent over a decade as a nuclear submarine engineer in the Royal Navy. I was trained to operate under pressure, to think clearly in complex environments, and to lead with precision.

Then motherhood arrived. Not in a way that took anything away from me — but in a way that changed everything. My attention, my energy, my relationship with time, and the way I experienced myself in the world.

I tried to keep running at the same pace. I tried to apply the same systems. I told myself I just needed to be more organised, more efficient, more consistent.

What I eventually realised was this: time was not the problem. I was carrying an invisible load that no productivity system had ever been built to hold. The mental load. The emotional labour. The weight of holding a career, a family, an identity, and a version of myself that was quietly, fundamentally shifting.

This reset was built from that experience — and from working with ambitious mothers who were doing everything right, and still feeling behind.

It is not a hack. It is not a system built for the woman you used to be. It is a reset built for the woman you are now.

Amanda — Founder, The Rising MOM

Before You Continue

What is taking most of your energy right now?

Select everything that feels true right now.

- ☐ Work pressure or deadlines
- ☐ Home life and family logistics
- ☐ Career uncertainty — what's next?
- ☐ Mental load — holding it all in my head
- ☐ Lack of time for myself
- ☐ Constant overwhelm — everything feels urgent

Hold that answer as you read. This reset is designed to meet you exactly where that pressure lives.

Come back to this page at the end. Notice which boxes still feel true — and which ones have already begun to shift.

You are not starting this because something is wrong with you. You are starting because you are ready to lead differently.

What Women Say

"I was pregnant with my third child, about to leave my job, and had no idea what the next chapter would be. It felt like staring into a scary black box." After our work together, I felt less tangled, more energised and finally able to move things that had felt stuck for years.

— MOTHER OF THREE

"Amanda helped me balance business, studies, family and self-care. Her energy and coaching style are perfectly suited to working with mums."

— ANGELA

"Her coaching brings fresh perspective, real empathy and a clear structure for moving forward. She makes a significant and positive difference."

— RACHEL

START HERE

Welcome

You do not need another generic productivity system. You do not need more pressure, more hacks, or another suggestion that the answer is simply to "get organised".

Because for most mothers, the problem is not a lack of effort. It is not laziness. It is not poor discipline. And it is certainly not a lack of capability.

The problem is that you are trying to manage a life that has changed, with standards and systems that often have not. Motherhood shifts capacity. It changes attention, energy, priorities, emotional load, tolerance, and the way your mind holds responsibility. Yet so many women still judge themselves as though nothing fundamental has changed.

Inside these pages, I will help you understand why time feels harder than it used to, where your time is really going, and how to create a system that works with your life now rather than against it.

This is not about doing more. It is about leading differently.

METHOD

How to Use This Reset

This reset is designed to be used in a practical way.

- Read a chapter.
- Listen to the matching audio.
- Complete the workbook prompt.
- Apply one shift at a time.

You do not need to consume everything in one sitting. In fact, it will work far better if you return to the parts that meet you where you are in the moment.

Some days you will need clarity. Some days you will need structure. Some days you will need to stop treating everything as urgent. And some days you will simply need permission to lead from a steadier place.

Use this reset repeatedly, not perfectly.

INSIDE

Contents

FOUNDATIONS

Welcome

How to Use This Reset

THE CHAPTERS

Chapter 1 — Why You Feel Behind Even When You're Trying Hard

Chapter 2 — The Hidden Time Leaks

Chapter 3 — The ANCHOR Method

Chapter 4 — How to Plan a Week That Actually Works

Chapter 5 — The 3 Daily Anchors System

Chapter 6 — Stop Treating Everything as Urgent

Chapter 7 — The Guilt-Free Reset

Chapter 8 — Your New Time Standards

PRACTICE & NEXT STEPS

What Happens Next?

The R.I.S.E Audio Series

Workbook Pages

Your Next Step

Why You Feel Behind Even When You're Trying Hard

There is a reason you feel as though you are always catching up. And it is not because you are doing life badly.

Many mothers live with a constant low-level sense of being behind. Behind on work, messages, home admin, meals, washing, planning, appointments — and the endless invisible jobs that hold family life together. Even when they are moving all day, there is often a quiet but persistent feeling that they are never quite on top of anything.

That feeling does not usually come from poor time management alone. It comes from the weight of mental load — the invisible responsibility of holding everything in your mind. Not just doing the task, but remembering it, anticipating it, planning it, tracking it, and noticing when nobody else has.

This creates decision fatigue. The more decisions you make in a day, the harder it becomes to make good ones. Then fragmented focus pulls your attention between roles and demands, and reactive planning takes over — creating movement, but not always progress.

You are not behind because you are failing. You feel behind because you are carrying more than most systems recognise. The real question is not, "Why can't I keep up?" It is: How do I create a way of leading my time that actually reflects the life I am living now?

Where do you feel most behind right now?

The Hidden Time Leaks

Some look like scrolling. Some look like interruptions. Some look like saying yes too quickly. But many of the biggest drains on your time are not really about the clock.

Digital distraction. A quick glance at a message becomes ten minutes. A notification pulls you out of a task, and you return with less focus than before.

Constant switching. Moving rapidly between tasks, people and roles might feel productive, but it often keeps you in a shallow state of focus.

Overhelping. Many women lose time because they are too available. Too responsive. Too quick to solve, support, explain, remind, rescue or hold.

Poor boundaries. Letting other people's urgency become your own.

Unmade decisions. When something has not been decided, it stays open in your mind. And carrying everything in your head makes you both the planner and the storage system.

The goal is not to eliminate every leak. The goal is to notice the ones that are costing you most right now.

The leak costing me most right now:

The ANCHOR Method

The answer is not to do more. The answer is to lead more deliberately. That is where the ANCHOR Method comes in.

A — Audit your time leaks. Before you can reclaim time, you need to see where it is actually going.

N — Name what matters now. One of the biggest sources of overwhelm is treating too many things as equally important. They are not.

C — Cut the drift. Drift is what happens when your time slowly gets swallowed by things you did not consciously choose.

H — Hold your anchors. Each day: one work anchor, one home anchor, one self anchor. O — Organise around real energy, not ideal capacity. R — Review and reset weekly. You do not need perfection. You need review.

The ANCHOR Method is not about squeezing more out of yourself. It is about building a steadier way of leading the life you have now.

Which part of ANCHOR do you need most right now?

How to Plan a Week That Actually Works

A week works when it reflects reality. Not optimism. Not pressure. Not the fantasy that you will operate like a machine and still have endless patience by Thursday.

Work priorities. Which one to three outcomes would make the week feel meaningful at work? Family logistics. School runs, clubs, appointments, childcare, handovers, forms, food and transport — these are not extras. They are structural parts of the week.

Meals and admin are the invisible jobs that often create more last-minute pressure than they need to. Recovery is not indulgent — it is what keeps you functional, focused and less resentful.

Transition space. Most mothers move rapidly between roles without any real mental or emotional shift. That transition matters. Overflow time is what stops your entire week collapsing under the weight of one disruption.

The mistake many women make is planning the week at maximum capacity. Plan at an honest capacity instead.

What would make your week feel lighter before it has even begun?

The 3 Daily Anchors System

Most women wake up already mentally carrying the whole day. The 3 Daily Anchors System brings the day back into focus.

Instead of trying to manage everything at once, you choose three stabilising points for the day: your work anchor — the most important professional focus; your home anchor — one thing that supports the functioning of home or family life; and your self anchor — one thing that keeps you in the picture.

This system works because it reduces noise. It helps you define enough. It stops the day being led only by urgency.

The mistake to avoid is turning anchors into another performance tool. They are not there to pressure you. They are there to steady you. That is still leadership.

My anchors for today — work, home, self:

Stop Treating Everything as Urgent

Urgency is often overused. Not everything that feels intense is urgent. Not everything that is emotionally loaded requires immediate action.

When something lands in your day, ask which category it truly belongs to: Important — it matters. Emotional — it feels charged. Habitual — you are doing it because you always do. Actually urgent — it truly needs action now. Can wait — it does not need your attention today.

Ask yourself: If I did not feel guilty, flustered or emotionally activated, would this still feel urgent?

When you begin filtering your decisions this way, you stop allowing every incoming demand to occupy the same level of importance. You become more deliberate. Less reactive. More discerning.

One thing in my day I can reclassify right now:

The Guilt-Free Reset

Some weeks fall apart. The plan goes. The routine goes. Someone gets ill. Work expands. You feel behind by Tuesday and emotionally worn down by Thursday. Then comes the part that often makes it worse: self-criticism.

A guilt-free reset starts with one decision: you stop treating a difficult week as evidence that you are failing. A hard week is not a character flaw.

When a week has been chaotic, the first question is not, "What is wrong with me?" It is, "What is true here?" What happened? What changed? What became unsustainable? What needed more support than you had?

The most useful reset is not emotional punishment. It is honest review. You do not need to punish yourself back into order. You need to lead yourself back into steadiness.

What would support me most right now?

Your New Time Standards

At some point, time pressure stops being only about time. It becomes about standards — what you believe a good mother should manage, what a capable professional should still be able to do, what you still expect from yourself even if your life no longer fits those expectations.

A good enough day is not a day where everything is done. It is a day where what mattered most was acknowledged, where the essentials were led as well as possible, and where you did not abandon yourself trying to prove you could do it all.

The goal is not to become who you were before. The goal is to become fully effective in who you are now. You are still allowed to be ambitious — but ambition after motherhood often needs a different rhythm. More intentional. More grounded. Less performative. More aligned.

Your new standards might sound like this: I do not treat everything as urgent. I define enough before the day starts. I do not plan at fantasy capacity. I leave room for real life. I lead from clarity, not constant pressure.

From now on, I am measuring a good day by:

TRANSITION

What Happens Next?

You have not reclaimed time because you became more productive.
You reclaimed time because you began leading differently.

The challenge is that time is rarely the only thing that changed after motherhood. Many women discover that beneath the overwhelm sits a deeper question: "What do I actually want now?"

Your career still matters. Your ambition is still real. But the version of you who built that career, made those decisions, and measured success in that particular way — she has changed. And no amount of better time management addresses that.

The women who come into The Rising MOM are not failing at productivity. They are succeeding at everything while quietly wondering whether they are doing the right things at all.

If that question has surfaced while you were reading, it is not a distraction. It is a signal.

LISTEN

The R.I.S.E Audio Series

Five guided resets for the moment you are in. Tap to listen when each one calls to you.

01 Morning R.I.S.E Reset

Move from overwhelm into intentional self-leadership.

▶ Listen to this reset

02 Midday R.I.S.E Reset

Move from reaction mode back into intentional action.

▶ Listen to this reset

03 Weekly R.I.S.E Review

Reflect, recalibrate and lead the week ahead.

▶ Listen to this reset

04 Evening R.I.S.E Reflection

Release the day and challenge unrealistic standards.

▶ Listen to this reset

05 Capacity & Self-Trust Reset

Reduce guilt and reconnect with self-trust.

▶ Listen to this reset

PRACTICE

Workbook Pages

This reset is most powerful when it moves beyond insight and into action.

Use these pages to notice your patterns, capture what matters, reduce mental noise and make clearer decisions.

Small shifts create steadier weeks.

Morning Clarity Page

Today's date

This morning I feel

My work anchor for today

My home anchor for today

My self anchor for today

What I am no longer available for today

What I am choosing instead

Reaction Mode Reset Page

What has tipped me into reaction mode today?

Where am I holding pressure in my body?

What is truly important right now?

What only feels urgent because it is loud?

One decision I can make now

The next clear step is

Weekly Reset Page

What felt heavy last week?

What actually worked well?

What am I still mentally carrying into this week?

My three most important outcomes this week

What support would make this week lighter?

End-of-Day Closure Page

What am I still mentally holding from today?

Does any of this need my attention tonight?

What can be held until tomorrow?

One thing that went well today

What I am choosing to put down tonight

Guilt, Pressure & Capacity Page

What am I currently expecting of myself?

Is this expectation honest and realistic?

What pressure am I carrying internally?

What is actually true about my life and capacity right now?

What would support me better instead?

Weekly Planning Page

This week's three priorities

Fixed commitments

My work anchor

My home anchor

My self anchor

What I am not available for this week

My first next step

Time Leaks Audit Page

Where is my time leaking most right now?

- ☐ Unclear priorities
- ☐ Phone or digital distraction
- ☐ Overthinking
- ☐ Overexplaining
- ☐ Doing things last minute
- ☐ Taking on too much
- ☐ Carrying everything in my head
- ☐ Poor boundaries
- ☐ Reacting instead of planning
- ☐ Trying to do everything perfectly

The biggest leak for me right now is

What this is costing me

What I will change first

THE NEXT STEP

Your Next Step

This reset gives you a practical system. But for many women, that is not the whole story. Because beneath the time pressure, there is often something deeper — the pressure to prove, the fear of dropping the ball, the guilt of wanting more, the sense that the old version of you no longer fits, but the new version is still being shaped.

Time management alone does not rebuild self-trust. It does not untangle guilt. It does not redefine identity. The system helps you reclaim time. The deeper work helps you reclaim yourself.

You do not need to become more efficient at abandoning yourself. You need a career and life that fit the woman you've become.

JOIN THE COMMUNITY

facebook.com/groups/the.rising.mom

BOOK A RISING MOM DESIGN CALL

calendly.com/therisingmom/career-audit

FOLLOW ON INSTAGRAM

@the_rising_mom_

The Rising MOM — Career Reinvention After Motherhood